Is Personal Freedom a Western Value? Thomas M. Franck	593
This article argues that personal autonomy and individual self-determination are products not of a specific region or historically based culture, but of recent developments in industrialization, urbanization, transportation, communications, information processing and education. These have already occurred in many non-Western states, often resulting in greater emphasis on human rights. The article also finds nothing inherently "Western" in liberal values and personal freedoms: until recently, most of us lived under communitarian constraints that would have made the Ayatollah Khomeini feel perfectly at home.
Rwandan Genocide and the International Law of Radio Jamming Jamie Frederic Metz	628
Through examining the use of radio broadcasts in the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, U.S. responses to it, and the international law and contemporary policy on radio jamming, this article argues that the traditional U.S. blanket rejection of jamming as a violation of free expression is no longer fully appropriate. It proposes a narrow exception to the general international standard supporting the free flow of information for cases of incitement to genocide or mass human rights abuse where the occurrence of genocide or such mass abuse is considered imminent.
