COVER: WORKERS IN A NAZI OIL FIELD. Despite the Nazis' need for large supplies of fuel, the German petroleum industry remained small and politically weak throughout the Hitler era. In this photograph, workers are drilling an oil bore-hole pump in Oberg. (Photograph courtesy of Bundesarchiv Koblenz, Bildsammlung, Bild 122/Transocean Nr. 128.) For an article on the oil industry in Nazi Germany, see pp. 254-77.

CONTRIBUTORS

EMILY S. ROSENBERG is professor of history at Macalester College. She received her Ph.D. from the State University of New York at Stony Brook in 1973, where she studied American foreign relations with David F. Trask. Her publications include Spreading the American Dream: American Economic and Cultural Expansion, 1890–1945 (1982) and numerous articles on United States–Latin American relations during the World War I period. She is also co-author of In Our Times: America Since 1945 (1982). This article is part of a larger study currently in progress on American foreign lending and financial advising, 1898–1929.

RICHARD RODGER is lecturer in economic and social history at Leicester University. In 1982–83 he was visiting professor and Fulbright Scholar at the University of Kansas. He has contributed to several books including The Pursuit of Urban History, The Structure of Nineteenth Century Cities, and Perspectives of the Scottish City. Other publications include A Bibliography of European Economic and Social History and articles on social and urban topics in Business History, the Journal of Historical Geography and the Urban History Yearbook. Currently he is working on a book on nineteenth-century housing and supervising a research project on the urban development of nineteenth-century Edinburgh.

JIM MCKENNA graduated from Liverpool University and currently is a personnel manager at Plessey UK Ltd. He has worked extensively on the papers of the major building trades unions at the Modern Record Centre, University of Warwick.

ROBERT R. LOCKE is professor of history at the University of Hawaii, Manoa. He received his Ph.D. from UCLA in 1966 where he studied with Eugene N. Anderson. His publications include French Legitimists and the Politics of Moral Order in the Early Third Republic (1974), Les fonderies et forges d'Alais (1979), and The End of the Practical Man: Entrepreneurship and Higher Education in Germany, France, and Great Britain, 1880 to 1940 (1984). For the past several years Locke has been engaged in a comparative study of the relationship between universities and industry in Europe, with special emphasis on the business schools. In 1977–78 he was Senior Fulbright Research Fellow at the Max Planck Institute for History, Göttingen. Between 1982 and 1984, he held the Esso European Chair at the European Institute for Advanced Studies in Management, Brussels. He has just been appointed to a Fulbright grant in the Western European Regional Research Program, 1985–86, half of the time to be spent on educational research in France, half in Great Britain.

RAYMOND G. STOKES has been a fellow of the Deutscher Akademischer Austauschdienst and guest of the Institut für Europäische Geschichte in Mainz, West Germany since October 1983. He has studied history at New College in Sarasota, Florida, and at Ohio State University. His research interest include the history of energy and of high technology industry in Germany in their political context. He is currently writing his dissertation under the supervision of Alan Beyerchen on the recovery of the western German chemical industry under the Allied occupation, 1945–51, focusing in particular on the three successor firms to I. G. Farben.

DAVID J. JEREMY is research fellow and editor of the Dictionary of Business Biography at the Business History Unit, London School of Economics and Political Science. He is the author of several books including Transatlantic Industrial Revolution: the Diffusion of Textile Technologies between Britain and America, 1790–1830s (1981), which received the Dexter Prize of the Society for the History of Technology and the John H. Dunning Prize of the American Historical Association. He is presently completing the Dictionary of Business Biography and plans to begin an analysis of the interactions between business leaders and the churches in Britain, 1900–60.

CHRISTOPHER S. ALLEN, a postdoctoral research fellow at the Harvard Business School, is coauthor of Unions and Economic Crisis: Britain, West Germany and Sweden (1984). He is currently preparing a manuscript on contemporary West German industrial policy.
