

way to find a reasonable solution to every problem and to take seriously every reasonable point of view. Doing the right thing was more important to him than gaining some temporary bureaucratic or personal advantage. He never hesitated to give his best and most honest advice, whatever the personal consequences.

The world badly needs more people like Jack McNeill. Now we have one less. We cannot bring him back, but we can try to remember what it was that made him such a fine human being and emulate that ourselves. So, farewell, good friend—we are so sorry to lose you, but so very glad to have traveled part of the journey with you.

TO THE CO-EDITORS IN CHIEF:

The Lowenfeld-Clagett discourse about Helms-Burton (Agora: The Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act, 90 AJIL 419 (1996)) is interesting and learned, but seems to me to miss one obvious—and probably decisive—factor in the debate about the legality of the Act. Perhaps only a few realize it, but the Organization of American States exists; the United States, Mexico and Canada are all members; and all are bound by the Charter of the OAS. That Charter provides in what seem to be unambiguous terms against intervention in the affairs of other member states. Article 18 reads: “No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatsoever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State.” Article 19 adds: “No State may use coercive measures of an economic or political nature . . . to force the sovereign will of another State.”

It seems clear that the intent of Helms-Burton is precisely to intervene in the affairs of several OAS member states (inter alia) and to force their “sovereign will.”<sup>1</sup> The United States can of course enact a law of this sort, but it will violate a treaty commitment in so doing.

TO THE CO-EDITORS IN CHIEF:

I was deeply surprised to read in the July 1996 issue of the Journal the Editorial Comment of Judith Hippler Bello on dispute settlement in the WTO (90 AJIL 416 (1996)). The view that WTO rules “are simply not ‘binding’ in the traditional sense,” that the WTO is “essentially a confederation [?] of sovereign national governments” that “relies upon voluntary compliance,” and that “[c]ompliance with the WTO . . . remains elective” (90 AJIL at 416–17) negates the common effort to transform the GATT’s weak, predominantly power-oriented system of economic relations into a legally binding order, governed by an international organization (the WTO) and subject to a quasi-judicial dispute-settlement mechanism.

It is true that the spirit of the system is to seek a balance among the economic interests of the parties, but not in disregard of legal obligations freely entered into as a part of the deal. Mutual accommodation of interests has to be sought at the stage of consulta-

<sup>1</sup> It might also be noted here that, on August 23, 1996, the Inter-American Juridical Committee, in response to a request for an opinion by the OAS General Assembly, unanimously approved its Resolution CJI/RES.II–14/96, to which was annexed the committee’s opinion on the legality under international law of legislation “whose content is similar to that of the Helms-Burton Act.” Focusing on the protection of property rights of nationals and the extraterritorial exercise of jurisdiction, the committee concluded that in these “significant areas . . . the bases and potential application of the legislation . . . are not in conformity with international law.” OAS Doc.
