A traditional task of epistemology is to establish and defend systematic standards that must be met in order for us to have knowledge or justified beliefs. A naturalized epistemology tries to arrive at such standards through an empirical investigation into how we interact with our fellows and the world around us, what we seek in these activities, and the particular ways in which we can and cannot succeed. This approach is a radical departure from tradition because its means of investigation is empirical.

Nevertheless, since its inception three decades ago, this style of epistemology has become a powerful trend in contemporary theory of knowledge. This collection breaks new ground in extending the insights and methodology of naturalized epistemology to the subject of moral knowledge and moral theory.

What might we know if we knew that the mind is an adaptation? What could knowledge of history or circumstances tell us about the individuation of content or the nature/rôle of vision? What can science—evolutionary theory in particular—tell us about the metaphysics of mind?

This collection of new essays concerning the mind explores the prospects for, and limits of, appealing to facts about evolutionary history and current environment-organism interaction in explaining the nature and workings of the mental. Each paper addresses empirical data from evolutionary theory, ethology, psychology, or neuroscience, though they vary with regard to their optimism as to what such discoveries can tell us about particular issues in the philosophy of mind.

Teaching Philosophy provides a peer-reviewed forum for the exchange of ideas about the challenges faced by philosophers in the classroom. It is the only journal devoted to the discussion of teaching and learning philosophy, and over the years it has published the largest body of original work on philosophy teaching in the English language. Each issue contains a unique mix of articles, reports, case studies, and reviews that are of continuing value to the profession. More information about the journal, including tables of contents of the most recent ten volumes and sample articles, is available at www.pdcnet.org/teachph.html.

Electronic access to all issues of Teaching Philosophy is provided through POIESIS: Philosophy Online Serials, and all tables of contents, searchable by author and title, are freely available through this project. The full text of the first twenty-five volumes is also available on a fully searchable CD-ROM available to individual subscribers at a 30% discount. Teaching Philosophy is committed to providing affordable access to all published issues, and by mid-2007 individual subscribers will have electronic access to the entire collection—at no extra charge.
