UNITED NATIONS LAW REPORTS
(Unofficial Reports on Legal Matters in the UN)

Sample Unsolicited Tributes

“Needless to say, we subscribe to your reports and find them enormously useful.”
Roger S. Clark, Board of Governors Professor, Rutgers School of Law.

“I would like to use the hypothetical situation presented in your editorial comment in the current UN Law Reports (relating to the United States and the International Criminal Court) as part of my international law teaching materials.” Frederic Kirgis, Law School Ass’n Alumni Professor, Washington and Lee University.

“On Thursday evening, I will show my ‘International Legal Research Seminar’ students the wonderful current awareness tool, United Nations Law Reports.” Jean Davis, Reference Librarian and Adjunct Professor of Law, Brooklyn Law School.

“I would like permission to recopy the following material(s) for the 1999-2000 academic year for use in John Norton Moore’s law courses at the University of Virginia School of Law and Georgetown University Law Center: Special Supplement: opinions on the legality of NATO’s attack against the FRY.” Lauren Greenwood, Center for National Security Law, Univ. of Virginia School of Law.

“There is much in it of interest. * * * It’s amazing how much is going on at the UN that is of legal interest. I don’t know how you keep up with it all.” James S. Sutterlin, former Special Assistant to Secretary-General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar.

Complementary Agreements and Compulsory Jurisdiction

A dispute may arise under complementary treaties, each of which provides for a different dispute settlement procedure. If these procedures are deemed mutually exclusive, which should prevail and according to what criteria? If they are not exclusive, how can the dissimilar procedures be accommodated? These questions implicate basic policies about the role and effect of long-term commitments to compulsory jurisdiction in the international legal order.

Bernard H. Oxman 277

The United States and Its Treaties: Observance and Breach

Recent developments have inspired doubts about the fidelity of the United States to its treaty obligations. This article surveys congressional overrides by federal law under the later-in-time rule, and actions by the executive, the courts, and the states that limit domestic implementation of certain treaties. It concludes that, contrary to general perceptions, actual U.S. practice is still largely compliant but that certain statements from each branch of the federal government indicate a new and troubling disrespect for U.S. treaty obligations.
