Editor's Note

Since 1962, the Review has occasionally published special issues summarizing progress in heavily researched fields or exploring new subjects or areas too long neglected by business and economic historians. By definition, these issues involve extraordinary planning, selection, and presentation arrangements; and, by definition, they cannot be regularly produced on demand. Nevertheless, we remain convinced that reasonably periodic special issues are useful synthesizing and focusing devices. The favorable receptions given our issues on fashion (1963), American government-business relationships (1964), international government-business relationships (1964), transportation (1965), and Latin America (1965) have been gratifying and have sustained us in our view.

With particular pride, we now present this special issue on Japanese entrepreneurial history. The articles herein, we believe, represent some of the most needed work in progress today among business and economic historians. Japan as an economic phenomenon excites us all, but Professors Rosovsky, Yamamura, Hirschmeier, Yui, Morikawa, Taira, and Evans have captured and focused that excitement with uncommon insight and skill. We welcome their penetration of the mythology surrounding the Japanese industrial experience and their enhancement of our understanding of the purposes, processes, and personalities involved. Also, to our consulting editors, Professors Yamamura and Rosovsky, go our thanks for their efforts to make this issue of the Review a really "special" one.
