ARIL's basic assumption is that full human life--both personal and social--requires the real integration of spiritual and intellectual commitments. Many of us, Jews and Christians, experience some conflict between our spiritual convictions and the prevailing ideologies which shape our intellectual work. We also perceive that the ruling ideologies of our day are woefully inadequate in spiritual depth and moral discernment to the frightening dilemmas we face as a society. For the sake, then, both of our spiritual and intellectual integrity and of our ability to contribute to the common good, many of us feel called to work towards a more fruitful integration of our spiritual/intellectual life.

ARIL offers you

RELIGION & INTELLECTUAL LIFE: a quarterly journal.

Each issue focuses on a theme of critical importance.

Religion and the Economy by Kenneth Boulding, Rosemary Houghton, and Arthur Waskow (Fall 1986)

Responses to a common text--Exodus 3, Moses at the Burning Bush-- by Jewish, Catholic, and Protestant scholars, artists, pastors, preachers, prophets, poets. . . (Winter 1987)

An analysis of the trend: Vocation-Profession-Career by Robert Bellah and William Sullivan with special attention to medicine--Edmund Pellegrino, M.D.; law--John Lee Smith; theological education--Max Stackhouse; education--Kathleen Lentz, et al. (Spring 1987)

The vexed question of Pluralism, its presence, its promises, and its dangers by David Tracy, Richard John Neuhaus, Daniel Polish, Riffat Hassan, Anton Ugolnik, and Preston Williams (Summer 1987)

The 4th ANNUAL ASSOCIATES CONSULTATION:

THE JEWISH/CHRISTIAN REALITY
