

Intracranial pressure was measured via a lumbar catheter and recorded continuously for 48 hours in 5 patients with suspected NPH. Simultaneous recordings of end tidal CO₂ and blood pressure were also performed, but no sleep stages were recorded. Before and after ICP monitoring and shunting, all patients underwent clinical and neuropsychological evaluation including Clinical Dementia Rating Scale, CERAD neurological battery, Trail Making, and Clock Drawing. B-waves were observed in the ICP recordings of all patients for a mean of 68% of total recording time. B-waves over 10 mm Hg with a ramp type morphology were present for 0.6%, 15.8%, 0.02%, 1%, and 0.25% of the total recording time. When the frequency of significant B waves was compared to outcome after shunting, good outcome was related to classic presentation and to the degree of cognitive defect prior to shunting. No correlation with percentage of high-amplitude B waves could be found. The study is still ongoing.
