THE HUMAN BODY AND THE LAW: A Medico-Legal Study

David W. Meyers

Transplant surgery, the medical definition of death, government enforcement and encouragement of sterilization, and euthanasia all have made a public issue of the question: how inviolate is the human body? This book compares and examines the positions on these matters in the United Kingdom, the United States, Europe, South Africa, and India and gives a valuable account not just of current medical attitudes, but of relevant case and statute law as it now stands. David Meyers is a practicing lawyer in California, with American and British legal qualifications. 203 pp. $7.95.

SETTLED OUT OF COURT:
The Social Process of Insurance Claims Adjustment

H. Laurence Ross, University of Denver

"For law and for sociology this book can be cited as a valuable contribution to the interface between the art of lawyering and the discipline of studying society."—Robert B. Yegge, Dean, College of Law, University of Denver, from the Foreword. This book clearly shows how and why "law in action" as it develops in the out-of-court settlement of insurance claims, differs from the formal law of statutes and appellate court decisions. 284 pp. $8.75.

LAW IN CULTURE AND SOCIETY

edited by Laura Nader, University of California, Berkeley

This book presents an original attempt to establish appropriate categories of analysis and generalization of the study of the process of law as a means of solving problems of violence and conflict. The papers deal with law in the most general sense—as a process of dispute settlement that is embedded in the cultures and social structures of particular societies. The book includes case studies from five continents and represents an important shift from a concern with what law is to what law does. 454 pp. $10.75.
