Contributors

NINA ETKIN is Associate Professor of Anthropology at the University of Hawaii. She has conducted extensive research on Hausa health and diet in northern Nigeria. Her research centres on malaria epidemiology and the ethnopharmacology of indigenous plant medicines. In 1986 she edited Plants in Indigenous Medicine and Diet.

JAMES FAIRHEAD recently completed his Ph.D. thesis in social anthropology at the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London. He did his fieldwork in 1986–88 on agricultural knowledge and production systems in lowland Bwisha, North Kivu.

ELIZABETH ISICHEI has been Reader in World Religions at Victoria University of Wellington (New Zealand) since 1985. Before that, she was for nine years Professor of History at the University of Jos in Nigeria. Among her books are A History of the Igbo People (1976) and the anthology Igbo Worlds (1978).

KEVIN KIMMAGE is funded by the ESRC (UK) to do research with Cambridge University's Department of Geography; he has studied the use of draught animals in Zambia as well as outgrower sugar schemes in Kenya. His current research in Nigeria is on the socio-economic impact of technical changes in small-scale irrigation.

IBRAHIM MUZZAMU is an independent researcher working in Kano State, Nigeria. He has collaborated in a variety of investigations on Nigerian health care delivery, nutrition and ethnobotany.

JOHAN POTTIER teaches social anthropology at the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London. He has worked previously in northern Zambia and in Rwanda on agriculture and food systems. In 1988 he published Migrants No More: settlement and survival in Mambwe villages, Zambia.

PAUL ROSS is a lecturer in anthropology and Adjunct Instructor in the College of Social Sciences at the University of Hawaii. His long-term investigations of Hausa ecology in northern Nigeria focus on resource allocation, health and nutrition.
