—James Chandler, University of Chicago

PRIVACY

Concealing the Eighteenth-Century Self

Patricia Meyer Spacks

"Patricia Spacks has composed a book of enviable range and reflection, illuminating the strategies that eighteenth-century characters devise to elude surveillance, and insisting on the problematic implications of 'what it might mean to let one another alone.' Privacy ranges among many different eighteenth-century texts with so much ease and authority that it reads at times like an engaging conversation with someone who has lived with her subjects for a long time and whose thoughts are wonderfully distilled, judicious, and persuasive. This splendid book is a pleasure to read."—Claudia Johnson, Princeton University

Ireland and China

ÉIRE/LAND

Edited by Vera Kreilkamp

Ireland has always been contested land, claimed by waves of invaders, each attempting to inscribe and possess the island territory. From medieval topographical surveys and Celtic artifacts to nineteenth-century landscapes and the expressionist art of the present day, this exhibition catalog collects pieces that collectively reveal Ireland's contested past—including works by Dierdre O'Mahony, Jack Butler Yeats, Sean Keating, and architect Brian Tolle. Drawing on original research by prominent international scholars and by the largest and most distinguished Irish studies faculty in North America, this volume relates those works and artifacts to new scholarship in a variety of disciplines, lending Ireland's visual history the cultural, historical, and political context it deserves.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON OPIUM, 1893–94

Reports, Minutes of Evidence, and Appendices
With a new introduction by Joyce A. Madancy

In 1893, the British government responded to growing criticism of its complicity in the Sino-Indian opium trade by constituting the Royal Commission on Opium. Much to the dismay of anti-opium activists, the Commission not only determined that the opium trade should continue, but also declared that “the temperate use of opium in India should be viewed in the same light as the temperate use of alcohol in England.” The report provides a rare glimpse at the cultural constructions of social deviance and morality, as well as the way race, class, culture, and power affected the application of medical concepts such as addiction and the idea of a “national character.”

This six-volume reprint makes the rare Royal Commission report and its supplements available in their entirety.
