workshops where political scientists and graduate students learned about teaching and research skills, developed computer expertise, and heard senior scholars reflect on the profession. Nearly 150 Annual Meeting attendees participated in this year's short course program.

Short courses this year included the Leading Scholar Series which featured Gabriel A. Almond and Heinz Eulau, both of Stanford University and both former APSA presidents. This session served as an extraordinary opportunity for graduate students to meet two high-profile political scientists and gain from their insight into the profession.

The program also included courses on the Internet and World Wide Web technologies and a course on databases available for legal research. Other courses offered opportunities to learn about teaching gender and politics, teaching citizen participation, and acting as a pre-law advisor to undergraduates. Workshops on defense and security in contemporary Asia, constitutional democracies, and California state politics in the 1990s were also included in the program.

Plans for the 1997 Short Course Program are presently underway. Those interested in sponsoring short courses at the 1997 Annual Meeting should contact Rob Hauck, Deputy Director of APSA.

Section Makes Contribution to Travel Grant Program

The growth of international participation at the APSA Annual Meeting has also increased the level of requests for financial assistance from international scholars. Recognizing the importance of international participation, the Organized Section on Women and Politics contributed $500 to assist in travel costs of Dr. Tatania Zakharova, a recent graduate of the Academy of Public Administration in Moscow. Currently working at the Priamursky Center in Khabarovsk, Zakharova's interests lay in empirical theory, data, and hypothesis-testing.

The Association is grateful to the organization for its generous contribution and encourages others to support APSA's efforts to broaden the participation of international scholars at the Annual Meeting.
