Aga Khan Program for Islamic Architecture Harvard University/Massachusetts Institute of Technology

An endowment supports the Documentation Centers established at Harvard and MIT, which are collecting printed and visual materials on Islamic art, architecture and urbanism to improve the flow of information on those subjects to the academic community and to professionals. The Documentation Centers are involved not only in the acquisition of library materials, but in such activities as surveying and photographing buildings and sites, and establishing contacts with complementary collections of photographs and documents in other institutions. Both centers welcome opportunities for exchanges and other cooperative arrangements with libraries in the Islamic countries, and with other organizations specializing in architecture in the Islamic world.

Five-year funds have also been made available to the Documentation Centers to find methods for storing, indexing, retrieving and disseminating data suitable for a computerized information service on Islamic art and architecture that can be used by scholars, teachers, researchers and practitioners interested in the study of Islamic architecture and in the contemporary built environment of the Islamic world. Some of the five-year funds have been allocated to research projects, but the only kinds of projects the Program will normally fund through outside application in 1982 are those that will encourage the rapid publication and dissemination of research already completed. General mailing address is: Aga Khan Program, Room 10-390, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, MA 02139, U.S.A.
