

CRITICAL PERSPECTIVES ARTICLE

Feminist Protest Action in Kenya: Lessons and Directions

Awino Okech

SOAS University of London, UK
Email: ao21@soas.ac.uk

(Received 20 October 2022; revised 16 November 2022; accepted 06 December 2022)

This essay historicizes feminist protests in Kenya over the last decade to examine the changing patterns of protest action and how they illustrate the evolution of both feminist discourses and sites within which these debates are animated. I look beyond the streets and direct action as the epitome of protest action to examine strategic litigation, hashtag activism, and national campaigns as important ways through which feminist protest can be understood in Kenya, focusing on three recent cases.

Feminist Activism in Kenya in Historical Perspective

In the 1980s and 1990s, women's rights organizations invested a significant amount of energy in changing laws that were seen to reduce women to second-class citizens. The key issues shaping advocacy included access to and ownership of land, violence against women, and women in leadership (Chesoni 2020). Organizations such as the Federation of Kenya Women Lawyers (FIDA), the Coalition on Violence against Women (COVAW), the Kenya Human Rights Commission (KHRC), and the Kenya Women's Political Caucus became critical voices on these issues (Action Aid 2021). The value of adopting a rights-based approach to addressing structural issues has long been criticized as insufficient for creating fundamental cultural and societal shifts (Kapur 2020). However, the language of rights, as I illustrate here, has been important for how feminist organizers have pursued freedom and justice.

Recent feminist protests have taken place in a distinct political environment. In 2010, a new constitution was approved through referendum. It adopted changes that were seen as radically shifting the country's gender landscape. One was regarding women's access to land, a key area of policy given the historical dispossession of women from marital homes and/or exclusion from inheritance that reinforced Kenyan society's patriarchal and patrilineal character (Chesoni 2020).

A second area was women's political participation. The focus was on stipulating a percentage of positions, including those in the bureaucracy, that would need to be filled by women, youth, and people with disabilities. Failure to meet the threshold, commonly referred to as the "no more than two-thirds principle," would result in an institution, whether parliament or a governing board, being considered unconstitutional. The interpretation and implementation of the two-thirds principle has been contentious since the constitution was adopted (Bouka, Berry, and Kamuru 2019).

Finally, abortion, alongside land ownership, became a lightning rod around which the Catholic Church and other conservative actors mobilized. Despite the church's opposition, the proposed changes on abortion provisions were relatively minor (International Campaign for Women's Right to Safe Abortion 2022). While the opposition was unsuccessful, it provides evidence of the conservative interpretation of gender relations and norms in Kenya.

Case Study I: Waremo Ni Yes

In this contested political and legal context, the grassroots movement Waremo ni Yes emerged. Loosely translated from Kiswahili as "Young Women Say Yes," the campaign sought to promote the constitutional draft offering progressive gender equality provisions. Waremo ni Yes grew out of Bunge la Wamama, a faction of the Bunge la Wananchi (People's Parliament) movement. Bunge la Wananchi emerged in the early 1990s as a public political education forum to debate religion, the slave trade, reparations, and social cultural economic rights (Gachihi 2014). When Bunge la Wananchi emerged, free speech, surveillance, disappearance, and detention without trial were key features of the political landscape. It was therefore a radical movement, claiming public space as a site for political debate rather than opting for less visible mobilizations.

As a loosely networked coalition, Waremo ni Yes leveraged the voices of young women as a constituency in support of the new constitution. In emphasizing youth as a basis for collective action, the movement confronted long-standing debates about young people as a category that was primarily understood through the lens of young men, therefore reproducing patriarchal norms in spaces in which youth is invoked as a constituency (Okech 2020). Emerging from the periurban centers of Nairobi, the Waremo ni Yes campaign animated protest in two main ways. The first was through its critique of the grassroots movement Bunge la Wananchi, which ostensibly represented the excluded masses but was also exclusionary toward women and girls. The second mode of animation was through the organizing mechanism used by Waremo ni Yes. Arranging caucuses and congresses, the organization deployed the principle of bunge (parliament), seeking to build consensus from the ground up by facilitating open discussions on property ownership, inheritance, and sexual and reproductive rights, with the aim of mobilizing support for the proposed constitution among young women (Mumbi 2010).

As a result of this work, Waremo ni Yes was considered one of the strongest constituency-based mobilizations during the constitutional review process, despite having fewer resources than other groups supporting or opposing the draft constitution. In taking the decision to develop a national mobilization process, Waremo ni Yes joined better-resourced interest groups and staked a claim based on youth, gender, and class interests. In so doing, it disrupted popular critiques of elitism used against feminist organizing in Kenya.

Case Studies 2 and 3: #Justiceforliz and #Justiceforsharon

Two other feminist mobilizations taking place in Kenya in recent years drew instead on the mobilization power of social media, using Twitter to galvanize a broad set of voices highlighting the extent of violence against women. The 2014 Kenya Demographic Health Survey noted that 4 out of 10 women between the ages of 15 and 49 years had experienced some of violence (KDHS 2014). Between March and April 2020, calls to the national gender-based violence hotline increased by 775%, and 3,650 gender-based violence cases were reported between March and July 2020 (UNOCHA 2020). Two of these prompted specific hashtag responses.

In the first case, Liz (not her real name) was a 16-year-old girl who had been beaten and gang-raped on her way home from her grandfather's funeral and dumped in a pit latrine in Busia, Kenya, in June 2013. She injured her spine, had to use a wheelchair, and developed fistulae. Liz identified her attackers to the police, and they were arrested. Their punishment: to cut the grass. National outrage was captured by journalist Njeri Rugene in reporting for the Daily Nation in October 2013. In 2015, a local court found three of the identified men guilty of gang-raping and causing grievous bodily harm to Liz. They were sentenced to 15 and 7 years in jail, respectively (Rugene 2013).

In the second case, the body of Sharon Otieno, a university student who was seven months pregnant, was found mutilated in Kodera Forest in Homa Bay County in September 2018. Sharon was abducted on September 3, together with a journalist who had gone to speak to her about her affair with the Migori governor, Okoth Obado, and the child she was expecting. The governor's personal assistant, Michael Oyamo, whom they were meeting to provide a response to the allegations, instead took their phones away and instigated their assault. The journalist escaped because he jumped out of the moving vehicle. Governor Obado and two others were arrested in connection with the murder. The case continues in court (Asamba 2018).

These two cases drew widespread engagement on social media, with both hashtags trending in Kenya for over 72 hours. #JusticeForLiz even attracted international attention. The visibility of the campaigns was attributable to the efforts of women's rights organizations such as COVAW, FEMNET, Equality Now, and FIDA. In the case of Liz, these groups collaborated on an offline engagement strategy that included support to Liz personally, mainstream media engagement, a global petition, a public march to the Director of Public Prosecutors' office, and the pursuit of a strategic litigation case on Liz's behalf (COVAW 2014).

#JusticeForSharon, on the other hand, emerged as a public response to the brutality of her death. This case, in particular, demonstrates the persistence of high levels of misogyny in Kenya, especially among those who viewed Sharon's murder as justified because she had had a relationship with a married man (Okech 2021). In both instances, the use of social media by feminist activists resulted in greater public awareness of violence against women, highlighting the importance of social media for creating greater accountability for these acts.

Conclusion

Viewed together, these three cases highlight two major approaches in recent feminist activism in Kenya. The Waremboni Yes campaign reinforces the importance of organizing and mobilization that relies on long-term movement-, constituency-, and consensus-building work to achieve change. The #JusticeForLiz and #JusticeForSharon cases, in contrast, show that social media has become a major new site of protest action. The result is a new generation of feminist communities that focus national attention on violence through feminist campaigns. All three case studies contributed to advancing debates on violence against women and girls in Kenya, drawing on changing legal and constitutional frameworks to channel actions on gender equality.

References

- Action Aid. 2021. "I Have Hopes That We Will Have Our Land Back." January 8. <https://actionaid.org/stories/2021/i-have-hopes-we-will-have-our-land-back> (accessed June 15, 2022).
- Asamba, Mercy. 2018. "Governor Okoth Obado Freed on Sh5m Cash Bail." The Standard. <https://www.standardmedia.co.ke/kenya/article/2001300190/governor-okoth-obado-free-but> (accessed June 15, 2022).
- Bouka, Yolande, Marie E. Berry, and Marilyn Muthoni Kamuru. 2019. "Women's Political Inclusion in Kenya's Devolved Political System." Journal of Eastern African Studies 13 (2): 313–33.
- Chesoni, Atsango. 2020. "Katiba@10: Is the Rain Beating Us?" The Elephant. September 17. <https://www.theelephant.info/videos/2020/09/17/atsango-chesoni-kenyas-constitution-when-did-the-rain-start-beating-us-part-i/> (accessed June 15, 2022).
- COVAW (Coalition on Violence Against Women). 2014. "Justice for Liz Archives." <https://cova.w.or.ke/category/justice-for-liz/> (accessed June 15, 2022).
- Gachihi, Gaceke. 2014. "Bunge La Mwananchi (The People's Parliament) Pt. I: Reflections on Social Movement Struggles in Kenya during the Era of Neoliberal Globalization." Pambazuka News, no. 705. <https://allafrica.com/stories/201412082805.html> (accessed January 12, 2023).
- International Campaign for Women's Right to Safe Abortion. 2022. "Major Victory: High Court Directs Parliament to Bring Abortion Law and Policy in Line with the Constitution." April 1. <https://www.safeabortionwomensright.org/news/kenya-major-victory-high-court-directs-parliament-to-bring-abortion-law-and-policy-in-line-with-the-constitution/> (accessed January 9, 2023).
- Kapur, Ratna. 2020. Gender, Alterity and Human Rights: Freedom in a Fishbowl. Northampton, MA: Edward Elgar.
- Mumbi, Ruth. 2010. "Focus on Keeping Promises Made to Women in 2010." The Star, December 13. <https://www.the-star.co.ke/news/2020-12-13-focus-on-keeping-promises-made-to-women-in-2010-constitution/> (accessed January 9, 2023).

- Okech, Awino. 2020. "Youth-hood, Gender and Feminist Dissent." In Gender, Protests and Political Change in Africa, ed. Awino Okech. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 13–34.
- Okech, Awino. 2021. "Feminist Digital Counterpublics: Challenging Femicide in Kenya and South Africa." Signs 46 (4): 1013–33.
- Rugene, Njeri. 2013. "Brave Busia Girl Battles as Her Rapists Go Scot Free." Daily Nation, October 7. <https://nation.africa/lifestyle/DN2/When-rapists-go-scot-free/957860-2022572-skD9s8z/index.html> (accessed June 15, 2022).
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (UNOCHA). 2020. "Kenya Situation Report." September 10. <https://reports.unocha.org/en/country/kenya/#cf-2rC8ktJetxZ4Z8kaabrv0s> (accessed January 13, 2023).

Awino Okech is a Reader in Political Sociology at SOAS University of London: ao21@soas.ac.uk

Cite this article: Okech, Awino. 2024. "Feminist Protest Action in Kenya: Lessons and Directions." Politics & Gender 20, 485–489. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S1743923X22000691>