Developments in the Field

The Business and Human Rights Journal (BHRJ) welcomes submissions for its Developments in the Field (DiF) section from a wide variety of contributors including scholars, human rights advocates, practitioners, government officials, civil society actors and business representatives. DiF submissions should be short and concise pieces of approximately 1,500-2,500 words (including footnotes), focused on timely and current milestones, innovations or other emerging trends, developments, and notable activities and events in business and human rights and related areas.

We seek pieces that capture developments in diverse settings and from diverse geographies. These would include, among others, contributions from or about communities impacted by corporate activities, social activists working on the ground to enhance business respect for human rights, teachers innovating in classrooms, corporate executives devising and implementing responsible business practices, legislators and policy makers deliberating on legal reforms, and courts as well as national human rights institutions developing principles or tools to strengthen access to justice for victims.

Potential contributors are encouraged to submit first for our consideration a succinct proposal (maximum 500 words) along with a brief bio of the author(s). Please submit through our online submission system, Scholar One: <https://mc.manuscriptcentral.com/bhrj>.

BHRJ considers submissions on a rolling basis. Please see the guidelines for contributors for more detailed information: <https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals/business-and-human-rights-journal/information/instructions-contributors> If you have any further queries, please contact us at: bhrj@cambridge.org.
